After the discovery of the Holy Lance, which became in a way an asset to the Provencals, Count Raymond assumes a new importance. There was much obstinacy and self-seeking mingled with his intense feeling in religious matters, and after Corbogha was finally repelled, he began to dispute with Bohemond for the possession of Antiooh. (l) Raymond had garrisoned his possessions in the city with six hundred men (2) and he repeatedly refused to give up the date of the Bridge to Bohemond.(3) There was some little dispute among the other leaders before they finally agreed to Bohemond s demand to deliver every holding into his keeping, but Raymond, in spite of his illness, declared that he would not willingly surrender the portions he held for prayers, promises, or threats.(4) Meanwhile, Raymond s possessions in France which he had...
