Excerpt: . . . her fathers feeble step she could not speak another word, and turned away from the door with a strange sinking at her heart. After they were gone, she could not but feel a little anxious and lonely. But, with the cares and duties of her new situation as housekeeper, keeping a daily journal to send weekly to her mother, as she had promised, and watching for letters, but little if any time, and less inclination, were left for study. She did not trouble herself, however, about the household affairs, but left the chief weight of them to rest upon Kittys broad shoulders, which, she thought, were much better fitted for them than her own, contenting herself with an occasional supervision. But she must see to Edwards comfort, who, in return, attended to all the out-door part of providing for the family; and Helen and Benny were under her especial care. To them she must act in her mothers stead. This she found by no means so easy a task at all times as she had supposed. All children have their faults and their little troubles; and she had frequent times of perplexity, when she missed her mother sadly. She had a few lines from her, written just after their arrival at New York, but merely saying that Mr. Worthington had borne the journey thus far tolerably well; and she waited anxiously for the next intelligence. It did not come until she had looked for...
